

BEGIN YOUR ANSWER TO QUESTION 1 HERE.

Entertainment does not have the capacity to ~~can~~ ruin our society. Entertainment is a new form of relaxation for those who work steady jobs throughout the week. For example, baseball is America's favorite pastime and a large form of entertainment. Baseball is a social gathering that brings people together to enjoy time. Going to the ballpark for most people is a day of relaxing and just sitting back and enjoying the game. Another form of entertainment for most people is watching television. For most individuals watching television is a normal habit and form of entertainment after a long, hard day at work. It allows them to sit back and in a chair, relax, and enjoy some time to rest while watching their favorite television shows. Through these two examples you can clearly see that entertainment does not ruin society at all. The capacity to ruin society is upheld ~~by~~ by the individuals who do not have jobs, and by those who seek entertainment from hurting somebody or watching somebody be hurt. This is not the form of entertainment ~~so~~ that most individuals believe is entertaining. Going camping, spending a day at the lake, watching sports and television, going to movies, and many other forms of entertainment as most see it do not have the capacity to ruin society. Happiness is drawn from entertainment and these social events. How could happiness be poisoned by ~~so~~ what all Americans love to do? Entertainment will never, and has never had the capacity "to overturn all morality, to poison the springs of domestic happiness, to dissolve the ties of our social order, and to involve our country in ruin."
